

Good report. Pleased to see the ambition around the diversification of waste streams. I think that normalising composting practices for household organic waste is absolute vital, both for the practical impact and for changing public perceptions of waste management.

My main criticism would be that I think it's important to prioritise communicating that the largest source of waste comes from the Construction and Demolition sector, while Masonry is the largest waste material. The impact of the building industry on the climate and ecosystems is so significant, yet rarely discussed. Creating a circular economy for construction needs to be a central part of the public conversation on transitioning to a sustainable society.
